The world was engulfed in World War II, and the United States was grappling with its position in the conflict. Roosevelt aimed to articulate a vision for a post-war world that was more just and secure for all. His address came at a time when isolationist sentiments were strong in America, and many citizens were hesitant to involve themselves in European affairs.

In this context, Roosevelt sought to galvanize support for aiding allies such as the United Kingdom, emphasizing that the fight against tyranny was a universal struggle that required collective action.
