Anne Bradstreet, born in 1612, is recognized as one of the first published American poets. The poem was written in response to a devastating fire that destroyed her home in 1666. This personal loss serves as the catalyst for a broader meditation on mortality, loss, and faith.

The poem itself is structured in rhymed couplets, reflecting the formal poetic conventions of the time. Bradstreet's ability to weave personal grief into universal themes allows readers to connect with her on both emotional and intellectual levels. The historical backdrop of the poem is vital, as it captures the Puritan ethos that emphasized the importance of spiritual wealth over material possessions.
